FRENCH AND ENGLISH DICTIONARY

Part One

PREFACE

Ever since the publication in 1934 of the first part of the Standard French and English Dictionary there has been a demand for an abridged edition of this work, which should retain only that which is essential for the needs of the general reader.

The following pages embody an attempt to meet this demand in ~~recompense~~ ^{Part I}. Of the 58,000 words dealt with in the Standard Dictionary 31,550 have been retained, and this would appear to form a sufficiently wide range for everyday use and for the enjoyment of current French literature. But the real difficulty, in an abridgment such as we have attempted, is to sift out and retain, under each vocable, those meanings and shades of meaning which are fundamental and essential, and to retain also, in a condensed form, enough of the phrasology that gives life to the word to ensure that of our larger work something more shall remain than a mere skeleton. We hope that this has been achieved in some measure. Among other things it will be apparent that the scientific and technical aspects of our modern civilization, which bulk largely in the parent work, still receive adequate treatment. On the other hand, as this Dictionary will no doubt be used in schools, that maxima reverentia has been observed which is due to the young.

The plan and general arrangement of this Shorter Dictionary remain substantially the same as in the Standard Dictionary; the subdivisions of each word are presented in the same order, so that where, in schools, for instance, the larger work is available for reference, the wider range of information contained therein will be accessible with a minimum of labour.

One innovation we have made, in order to save much space and redundancy. In hundreds of cases the adjective in French has a corresponding adverb in -ment, where the adjective in English has also an adverb in -ly:

agréable, agréablement, agreeable, agreeably; pleasant, pleasantly;
actif, activement, active, actively; grand, grandement, great, greatly.

In all cases where this correspondence occurs without any call for fuller treatment, the article devoted to the French adjective is followed by the entry -ment, or -ement, and it will be understood that in English there exists an adverb in -ly, formed from the adjective as shown above.

There is also a frequent correspondence between the French suffix -té and English -ness:

léger, légèreté, light, lightness;
bénin, bénignité, mild, mildness.

Again, from many French verbs are formed abstract nouns in -age, -ment, -ation, which may be rendered in English by gerunds or verbal nouns in -ing:

ajuster, ajustage, to adjust, adjusting;
allaiter, allaitement, to suckle, suckling;
assimiler, assimilation, to liken, likening;

and many nouns and adjectives in -eur, -euse, denoting the 'doer' or agent, have English counterparts in -ing, -er:

? se moquer, moqueur, to scoff; a. scoffing, s. scoffer.

The adjectival ending -ant is nearly always rendered by -ing:

amuser, amusant, to amuse, amusing;

and the suffix -able rendered by -able:

accepter, acceptable, to accept, acceptable;

with a derived noun in -abilité, in English -ability or -ableness:

acceptabilité, acceptability, acceptableness.

The endings shown above in heavy type have been used freely to indicate the existence of French derivatives the meaning and translation of which offers no difficulty.

To indicate the pronunciation the symbols used are those of the Association Phonétique Internationale, as in the Standard Dictionary, and the abbreviations used in the body of the book are the same.

'Etymology' has not been dealt with, but when a derivative has been formed within the French language itself, and the source is not obvious, it may be helpful to give an indication of the parent word, and this has been done in the form of a hint between square brackets. Thus: avoisiner [VOISIN], affamer [FAIM], bémol [B MOL], claveau [CLEF].
